See Maine as others see us, flipping through the travel guide books & internet ratings. We can help you read between the lines. BY CLAIRE Z. CRAMER

We Mainers can’t resist playing tour guide for visiting friends from away. Is it because we’re fascinated with the strangers in ourselves? With feigned detachment, we count the stars that rate the finest hotels and inns around us on the Maine Coast.

Here’s a look at some of these top destination attractions as the outside press is touting them:

SUPERCAMP
Kennebunkport’s Hidden Pond Resort is on Travel & Leisure’s Top 20 Resorts in the Northeast list and rates near the top of Conde Nast Traveler’s Reader’s Choice Best Resorts Northeast. The latter publication raves: “On 60 acres…outside preppy Kennebunkport, Hidden Pond has a fantasy summer camp feel, with hand-painted wood signs pointing to a garden where you can pick vegetables or to a bike shed where you can borrow a retro cruiser for the mile ride to Goose Rocks Beach. Cottages…range from the playful Periwinkle (in sunshiny primary colors) to the classic Thank You (embroidered lobster pillows and an airy seafoam and powder blue New England aesthetic)... A central lodge functions as the official clubhouse, with a simple rectangular pool and a fire pit where there’s a nightly bonfire (singing optional)."

Hidden Pond’s James Beard Award-winner Ken Oringer is on the premises, rolling out fresh pasta; wood-grilling pizzas and native seafood; and composing gemlike, just-picked organic salads at Earth restaurant. Fancy camp has its rewards.

But BTW, if it’s an ocean view you crave without having to take a one-mile complimentary retro Schwinn bike ride to get there, no matter how charming, and you’d rather wear earrings and heels when you gaze out at the crashing surf, Travel & Leisure’s Colleen Clark notes in her Best Affordable Beach Resorts list that the Tides Beach Club is “a renovated pink Victorian on Goose Rocks Beach...showing off a new preppy-glam look...with...the occasional zebra rug. A jewel-box bar serves oysters and bubbly and lobster service at fish-stick prices.”

Ratings Sense & Sensibility
ForbesTravelGuides.com became a formidable player in travel writing and rating after taking over Mobil Travel Guides’ long-running book series in 2011. Writer Larry Olmsted names Cape Elizabeth’s Inn by the Sea to Forbes’s Hotels of the Year 2013 list, asserting, “Everyone loves the Maine coast as a tourist destination, and the Inn By The Sea is the best place to stay here. It has great rooms and suites...one of the state’s best restaurant’s, Seaglass...a fantastic beach... secluded yet just a 10-minute drive from Portland’s historic waterfront.” Olmsted may not have stayed long—he was completely dazzled by a “unique lobster program where guests can go out on a working boat and catch their own, followed by a 5-course gourmet lobster dinner.” These Maine resorts—what will they think of next? Frommer’s applies a more white-glove, persnickety-Yankee standard. The Claremont Hotel in Southwest Harbor makes the cut among their Best Country Inns because “this waterside lodge has everything a Victorian resort should, including sparely decorated rooms, creaky floorboards in the halls, great views of the water and mountains, and a croquet pitch.”

Kennebunk’s White Barn Inn makes the same list because among other things it offers guests a buffer from, well, Mainers. “Much of the...staff hails from Europe, and they treat guests graciously.” Travel & Leisure is hung up on uptight, too. Their take on the Black Point Inn: “...an old-fashioned grandeur still infuses the lodge’s 25 rooms and suites, and etiquette is still taken seriously here; jackets are required for men in the formal dining room at dinner (which often includes regional standbys like New England clam chowder or butter-poached lobster). The inn’s outdoor assets are even more captivating—they include an enormous veranda with inviting wicker rockers, scenic 18-hole golf course, and the nearby Cliff Walk, a rocky one-mile trail where Winslow Homer liked to take in the seascapes...”

Nostalgia for old-fashioned, no-non-sense Yankee values clings like a gauzy illusion to the national press’s perception of Maine. Boston Magazine’s New England Travel Guide series hails the time-warp charm of the Asticou Inn in Northeast Har-
5-star hotel rating system, but sometimes it’s sworn at. All the hotels on Portland’s peninsula are given 3 stars (although the new Westin is not yet included). Only Kennebunk’s White Barn Inn and the Holiday Inn Regency in Bar Harbor make it to four stars.

Fodor’s Travel online labels a handful of Maine hotels “Fodor’s Choice,” including the Blair Hill Inn in Greenville, the Bar Harbor Inn; the midcoast Norumbega Inn, Samoset Resort, Sebasco Harbor Resort; and the Captain Lord Mansion, and Colony Hotel further south. These are discerning choices of undeniably fine accommodations. But the Fodor’s of 2014 may be just a bit too “awesome,” as it provides little opinion or nuance beyond the predictable “fabulous views” and praise of room and bath size. Why have their descriptions become auto-tuned and robotic? An explanation of the Fodor’s Choice ranking reveals that input from readers figures in the equation. And they’ve added something separate called “Fodorite Reviews,” which are just comments from anyone with an opinion and a need to share it.

Fodor’s for depending on random contributions, though, since ratings of hotels and restaurants online have all been forever changed (infected? corrupted?) by the internet. You can find stars lavishly bestowed and stars bitterly withheld on the net, the distilled median opinions of uncredentialed, unknown Yelp/Tripadvisor/Expedia know-it-alls.

Type Portland Westin Harborview into your search box and behold the star skirmish among the raters. Five stars from Expedia, but only 3 from Google Reviews. Who, or should I say whom, do you trust?

TRAVELER VS. TOURIST
Stars bring up another issue about hotel ratings. “It’s really what you’re used to,” says Cindy Cosmos at AAA Northern New England’s Portland office. “It’s a case-by-case scenario.” In other words, after a night at a Motel 6 in Schenectady on your way here, the Holiday Inn by the Bay will feel like the Taj Mahal. Isn’t that why we travel? Triple A (American Automobile Association) guidebooks use a five-diamond rating system, but if you don’t see a hotel on a list, it doesn’t indicate unworthiness; it just means Triple-A hasn’t been there. Triple-A is pretty much just-the-facts: Restaurant on the premises? Pets OK? Room service? Phones in the rooms? A/C? But once in a while, they rave: You’ll find “luxurious guest rooms and tons of amenities” at the four-diamond Portland Harbor Hotel. How many tons, exactly?

Not too long ago, if you were visiting Portland and you learned from your trusted guidebook about a hotel bar called the Top of the East—the highest roof bar north of Boston, so high it offered a view of the entire city—you’d go check out that glittering skyline yourself. You wouldn’t consult your smartphone first for opinions about the service and drink prices.

Where to stay, according to folks from away. But is the internet subverting the star system?

And speaking of opinions, shouldn’t the raters actually know the territory before dealing out the stars? Michelin, once the cultural arbiter of travel—the publisher of precise, concise, skinny red-and-green guidebooks and attendant street maps for all of Europe and beyond—has posted some eye-opening opinions about Portland. On the viamichelin.com website, the perfectly respectable Residence Inn in Scarborough is awarded the highest three-star rating, but the Inn by the Sea with its beautiful beach setting and excellent restaurant, is given just two. On the travel.michelin.com website, the Old Port is given two stars, but “downtown” is dismissed with just one: “The central downtown area is bounded by the Willamette River on the east and the curve of I-405 on the other sides…” Sounds like someone took a wrong turn and ended up in Portland, Oregon. How was the pinot noir, guys?
